Unipart Rebutts “Black Tape on Desk” Allegations

Unipart has rebutted allegations that its consultants recommended the use of black tape on desks to indicate the position of pens and other personal items at a Government site. This is categorically untrue.

Unipart’s Lean experts engage people in organising their workplace to make their work easier and to enable them to be more effective. The workplace organisation activity is only one element of the introduction of the Lean techniques used and taught by experienced Unipart practitioners.

This approach has been adapted for use in offices, factories, warehouses and other facilities based on the requirements of the site and to suit the way in which people work. It is a tried and tested approach that yields positive results. When people have been taught to implement workplace organisation in this way, the benefits are generally strongly welcomed by work teams.

The work undertaken by our consultants in Government offices has led to significant savings on behalf of the taxpayer as evidenced by the independent National Audit Office report of 6th July 2007 which described the purpose of Lean as "to streamline key work processes to eliminate duplication or reworking, improve accuracy, increase productivity, and reduce lead times in processing cases", and predicted savings to the taxpayer of £440 million by 2011 "the majority of which will be achieved through implementing Lean."
